- "An autobiographical account of the architect's career. Views his career as emerging in parallel with the development of constructivism in Soviet architecture from 1923 to 1933; and thus provides an excellent synopsis of the major influences affecting the rise of constructivism. Sees the competition for the Palace of Labor, the 1923 Agricultural Exhibit in Moscow, and the 1924 exhibit of Revolutionary German Artists, including the architects Gropius, Meyer, Mendelsohn, Mies van der Rohe, and others as greatly affecting the evolution of constructivism in Soviet architecture. Barkhin enumerates his work for the period covered and gives his views on the recent proclamation for the reorganization of the Soviet architectural community. A number of excellent plates. An important source"(Senkevitch).

- "Observes that tectonic systems are qualitatively distinguished from constructive systems. Asserts on the one hand that the constructive basis should be reflected not independently but as part of the artistic image, while on the other, that the negation and ignorance of tectonic methods has led to the decorative excesses and eclecticism in Soviet architecture. One of the first attempts in this period to reformulate constructive considerations as an integral aspect of the Soviet architectural aesthetic; a precursor of the new "materialist" aesthetic, posited in 1955-56"(Senkevitch).

- "Survey of the history of Soviet architecture, divided by periods: 1) 1917-32, 2) 1933-41, 3) 1941-54, and 4) 1955-67. Reinforced by analysis of works characterizing the basic stages in the development of Soviet architecture. Although a bit general and lacking any scholarly apparatus, it is the first Soviet history to deal objectively with the modern currents in Soviet architecture and thereby to provide a sound historical perspective of its development. Generous collection of photographs and graphic material, though many of only moderate quality"(Senkevitch). Introduction and captions in English and French.

- "Analyzes the development of the Marxist theory of cognition as developed in Lenin's work, Materializm i empiriokrititsizm [Materialism and empiric criticism], 1909, Argues that in developing the materialist theory of reflection, Lenin set forth criteria for the reflection of the objective world in the consciousness of man, thereby positing the philosophical basis for socialist realism. A highly theoretical though important ideological discourse on the foundations of socialist realism in Soviet architecture"(Senkevitch).

- "A comprehensive account of recent meetings of the Academy of Architecture that provided a forum for intensive self-criticism of past errors by architects and administrators of the Academy, in response to the decree by the 19th Congress of the Communist Party ordering the elimination of excesses in design and construction and a corresponding increase in the use of precast concrete elements. The Academy was under attack for failing to formulate a sound policy for Soviet architecture and for negating the technical aspects of architectural practise. A.G. Mordvinov, president of the Academy, was attacked in his capacity both as an architect and as chief administrator of the Academy for stressing the artistic aspect of Soviet architecture, at the expense of structural and technological considerations. B. Mikhailov observed that there has existed a struggle in Soviet architecture between realism and formalism, the latter including constructivism and its companion modern movement, but presently including also the trend of pseudo-classicism. An illuminating source documenting the extent of change in the official attitudes and demands on Soviet architecture"(Senkevitch).

- "Contents that the Marxist development of theoretical questions in Soviet architecture and the problems of assimilating the architectural heritage were disregarded in the Institute because Karo Alabian, vice-president of the Academy of Architecture, did not maintain the Party line in architecture, supported a group of "bourgeois cosmopolitans" within the Academy, generated an incorrect direction for research work, and concealed criticism of the insufficiency in the work of the Academy. Condemns the insufficient struggle for ideology and party spirit within the ranks of the Academy, cites several works by established scholars to support these accusations, and admonishes the Academy to improve the quality of its work by eliminating all vestiges of cosmopolitanism, aesthetic formalism, and bourgeois objectivism"(Senkevitch).

- "An assessment of Shchusev's major projects, with an analysis of the sources and inspirations for the respective designs. Includes an evaluation of Shchusev's designs in the constructivist idiom, which are considered here as part of the "fashionable homage" paid to the movement by all Soviet architects in the twenties. Contains highly useful plates and valuable information, though framed in a moderate amount of polemic characteristic of the period"(Senkevitch).

"A highly charged account of the highlights of the architect's career on the occasion of his death. Contains some useful information, though framed in a degree both of high emotion commensurate with the occasion and a polemic characteristic of the period that precludes objectivity in the presentation of the material"(Senkevitch).

Contains also an announcement of Shchusev's death by the Council of Ministers of the USSR and a decree ordering that the Museum of Russian Architecture be named after him, that the Academy of Architecture publish a series of albums of his work, that a number of scholarships be established in his honour in specified architectural schools, that the buildings he designed be so designated by appropriate markers, and that specified pensions be awarded to the immediate members of his family for the rest of their lives. Important because it represents the highest tribute ever paid a Soviet architect by the government.

- "A review of the emergence of the socialist architectural style and its current state of development. Of great significance for postulating formally the new aesthetic basis for Soviet architecture following the decree of November 4, 1955. Where the architecture of the preceding decades was based on superficial attention to the outward appearance of the building, the primary considerations for contemporary Soviet architecture are to be man's needs and comforts and the optimum provision for his work and rest; these requirements are to be synthesized with aesthetic considerations. Finally, newly emerging building materials and a constantly progressing building technology should permit a great diversity of idioms and preclude the promulgation of any single style. Of great significance both as a new manifesto for Soviet architecture and an indication of the cycle through which Soviet architecture has developed since 1917"(Senkevitch).
